PRINCIPLES OF ADMINISTRATIVE AND SUPERVISORY MANAGEMENT

by J. E. Morgan Prentice-Hall, Englewood Cliffs, NJ 07632

372-page hardback

$11.95

This would make a fine text in a supervisory training program. An unusual aspect: it is written by a training director, not an academician. The author is with Georgia-Pacific. In his book, he treats management as a universal process applying to both the administrator and the supervisor regardless of field. Covered also are both theory and practice, integrating the principles of McGregor, Likert, Maslow, and Herzberg with practical how-to instructions.

The book presents communications as a separate yet integrated process of management, in Chapter 4. Chapter 5 covers managerial economics, stressing the profit-cost relationship in management decision making.

Each part of this book has a definite objective in mind: (1) to develop management-mindedness; (2) to develop people-mindedness; (3) to develop supervisory skills; (4) to develop management techniques.

Discussion questions and more than 30 case studies are included. There are 20 chapters with four sections: Management Process, Human Relations, Supervisory Skills, and Management Techniques.

The separate instructor's guide suggests a course outline, instructional methods, assignments, outside reading and films. It has answers to case studies, a 50-question exam for each of the four parts of the book, and exam answers. Ask for the guide when you place your book order. It is free.

THE JOB REVOLUTION

by Judson Gooding
Walker and Company, 720 5th Ave., New York, NY 10019
213-page hardback $7.95

Interviews at all levels of employment around the country form the bases for this book. It offers an up-to-date appraisal of the new attitudes toward jobs, with particular emphasis on the feelings of younger employees.

"In the past, jobs were just thought of as tasks to be done, not as something to be questioned or evaluated," Gooding writes. "Now...jobs are often thought of as temporary. . . . Considerations of security are almost never a factor today, despite current economic problems, because none of the younger workers have ever had to worry about security in their lifetimes.

"Educational levels are higher and expectations are rising accordingly," Gooding finds. This is true at practically all levels of work, from blue-collar to professional jobs. Today's worker knows public policy will not allow him to starve. A job is chosen now, in part, for the fulfillment it offers.

This fundamental change has led some enlightened companies to make radical transformations in work implementation. These new approaches have generated some remarkable successes, the book says.

Gooding writes about what is happening to work today-how jobs frustrate employees, the roles of supervisors confronted with the new work ethic, and what is likely to happen in the working world tomorrow. The book is revealing and significant both for those who train employees and those who direct them.
